10) The military authorities to whom the prisoner was surrendered report that the character of the prisoner was bad that he was also guilty of desertion. No punishment was however inflicted on him then as he was said to be mentally unsound. One of the conditions on which the prisoner was sent from the jail is that any convict misbehaving himself will be returned to jail to finish his sentence. The question for consideration is whether the report that his character was bad and that he is guilty of desertion & the proof that he misbehaved within the meaning of the condition. The report that his character was bad seems to be very vague. As regards desertion the Military authorities themselves seem to have thought that he was mentally unfit, and it is probable that in a fit of such unsoundness, he might have committed desertion. It is a point for order whether the above view is to be taken on the meagre report or have the prisoner surrendered to British authorities for undergoing the remaining
